The basics of how to do this are as follows: Wait for the page to load; Copy the new image from the DOM, something like: `var img = document.getElementById('random_image');` `var newimg = document.createElement('img');` `newimg.src = img.src;` `img.parentNode.replaceChild(newimg, img);` Or, if you just want the image to load, use the onload event of the image to do the copying. This will be faster than replacing the element, though you have to think about how you would cancel that, as you can't replace the same element twice in one action. `document.querySelector('#random_image').src = src;` `document.querySelector('#random_image').onload = function () { var img = document.getElementById('random_image');` `var newimg = document.createElement('img');` `newimg.src = img.src;` `img.parentNode.replaceChild(newimg, img); }` Replace the image using the onload event. `var img = document.getElementById('random_image');` `var newimg = document.createElement('img');` `newimg.src = img.src;` `img.parentNode.replaceChild(newimg, img);` `img.onload = function () { // img doesn't need to be replaced, but you need to do the same thing // that you did in step 3: var newimg = document.createElement('img');` `newimg.src = img.src;` `img.parentNode.replaceChild(newimg, img); }` Through the analysis of a range of indicators from an array of sources, we have identified a number of weaknesses in the national system.
